Imagine this scenario: You're looking to buy a home in Atlanta, San Francisco and Tampa, Florida – three of the nation's most competitive housing markets.

But, those dreams could get dashed waiting for a loan to help with the mortgage as multiple all-cash offers come rumbling in, squeezing you out of the process.

If there is one thing that marketers and advertisers will not be able to escape from in 2022, it is the so-called metaverse, the parallel digital universe that will allow us mere mortals to flit between reality as we know it and a supposedly utopian augmented reality that many of the world's leading tech giants and gaming companies think we all need.

India, Jan. 9 -- Over the past year, the game development industry in India has changed dramatically. Already one of the biggest markets for online games, developers have been venturing into new frontiers to reshape the gaming experience.

Players will soon be able to create NFTs within games developed by Indian studios, exchange them for digital currency, use such currency to socialise, compete and run virtual businesses within and across gaming worlds.

The origins of the term metaverse can be traced to Neal Stephenson's 1992 novel called Snow Crash. In the book, the writer describes a 3D virtual world where real people interact in the metaverse by using avatars; these are their virtual personalities.

Some years, the most important elements of the annual CES tech show happen hundreds of miles away from the Las Vegas Strip. In 2007, Apple chose a day in the middle of CES to launch the iPhone -- from San Francisco's Moscone Center. The whole tech press corps fled CES en masse, saw the launch of one of the most important tech products ever, and then came back to Las Vegas to eat more shrimp and wait in more taxi lines.

This past year saw the emergence of many novel and perplexing investing trends, such as the Reddit-driven frenzy around meme stocks and the explosion in non-fungible tokens (NFTs). The latest is no less confounding to those on the outside: real estate in the metaverse.

A handful of upstart companies are spending millions to purchase land in online worlds that can only be visited on computer screens or through virtual reality headsets – worlds with names such as Decentraland, Sandbox and Somnium Space. These virtual real estate moguls plan to monetize their pixels through property development, rental income and advertising.

A jacket equipped with sensors that let wearers feel hugs or even punches in virtual reality was among the innovations giving the metaverse a more realistic edge at the Consumer Electronics Show.

"What is the metaverse if you can't feel it?" asked Jose Fuertes, founder of the Spain-based startup Owo, which made the jacket. "It's just avatars."

TOKYO, Jan. 7 -- It has been over five decades since Japanese roboticist Masahiro Mori developed a theory describing the eerie or uneasy feeling people experience in response to humanoid robots that closely, but not perfectly, resemble human beings.

Labeled the "uncanny valley" by Mori in 1970, the phenomenon has stood the test of time with more recent examples of creepiness filtering into the burgeoning fields of artificial intelligence, photorealistic computer animation, virtual reality, augmented reality, and increasingly lifelike androids.

2022 will be a year of big tech promises. Whether companies can deliver is another question.

We'll get our first clues at this week's CES electronics show in Las Vegas - a sprawling event that offers an exclusive glimpse at the tech that could help shape the year. (That is, unless the high transmissibility of the omicron variant of the coronavirus forces organizers to shutter the show. Big-name attendees including Intel, Meta and Amazon have pulled out, and show organizers have shortened the event by one day - it now runs Wednesday through Friday.)

As we enter 2022, tech stands at the edge of a revolution. This is the moment we transition from the era of Web 2.0 — of Facebook and Twitter, et al. — to the age of Web3, a shiny new decentralized world of the metaverse and crypto.

At least, that is what Silicon Valley would have us believe. The massive store of wealth that has been captured there in the last 20 years is now being marshalled to usher in the next phase of big tech. Venture capitalists, analysts, grifters and the sincere alike are gathering behind a new vision of tech that relies on the blockchain, the metaverse and the idea that the virtual world is suddenly going to become its own sphere of existence.

In its current form, the internet relies on data collection that some critics liken to mass surveillance. Technology companies and researchers are beginning to wonder whether the metaverse will be any different.

Facebook Inc.'s name change to Meta Platforms Inc. signaled that businesses behind games, office tools and other services will increasingly invest in this next iteration of cyberspace. Their pitch is to create loosely connected communities where users can work, play and shop using digital avatars.

South Korean giant Samsung is among companies that will use this week's Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas to stake out territory in the metaverse.

Samsung already has its own virtual reality world called My House – built in collaboration with fellow Korean corporation Naver Z – but it will use CES to showcase metaverse-type applications accessed through its TVs and phones, according to conference organiser the Consumer Technology Association.

The metaverse, one of the most buzzy terms of the tech industry, could be many things. It could be a virtual world where imagination is the only limit. Or it could be a less fantastical place for holding business meetings without leaving home.

For the tech titans getting behind this big idea, the metaverse could be something more tangible: the next great way to make piles of money.

Big tech seems like an obvious way to invest in the metaverse. Facebook, Apple, Amazon, Microsoft and Google have a collective market cap of around $9tn and the ability to pour billions into the development of a digital universe.

While these giants have made strides in the realm, their brand names mean higher valuations for investors looking to jump on board.

Among the drawbacks to Facebook's recent rebranding as a "metaverse" company are that it is no longer enough just to make a solid videogame device.

The company now formally known as Meta Platforms appears to have had a decent holiday season for its Oculus VR headset. Analysts for KeyBanc Capital and Jefferies both noted in reports last week that downloads of the Oculus app jumped over Christmas; Brent Thill of Jefferies added that daily active users of the app on Christmas Day were up 90% from the same day the previous year. Facebook has never regularly disclosed sales data for Oculus, which it acquired in 2014 for $2 billion. But IDC estimates that unit sales of the company's VR devices in 2021 will come in between 5.3 million and 6.8 million, once the market research firm's fourth-quarter data is finalized.

People are getting married in the metaverse now, we're told. Speculators are buying real estate in the metaverse, according to the headlines. Managers must learn to hold meetings in the metaverse, it would seem. In December, an executive at Facebook - er, Meta - gave an interview in the metaverse.

One slight hitch: The metaverse doesn't exist yet, and it probably won't anytime soon.

Digital-property prices are going through the roof

"RIDICULOUS AND cool." That is the architectural brief for a new office tower under construction in the Crypto Valley, a business district of Decentraland, a virtual platform built on the Ethereum blockchain. The edifice--owned by Tokens.com, a blockchain investor--will be a cross between a nightclub in Ibiza and the Bellagio resort in Las Vegas. In a fantasy world unencumbered by something as pedestrian as physics, a rotating company logo will float above the tower as nearby clouds shoot out company-branded thunderbolts. The tower's purpose--to provide office leases for firms and event space for crypto conferences--is humdrum by comparison.

Big Tech has various visions for the next stage of the internet You have to hand it to Mark Zuckerberg. When the founder of Facebook announced in October that he was changing the name of the social-media network's parent company to Meta Platforms in order to help create an alternative digital reality known as the metaverse, he was mercilessly mocked. To some, he was generating a smokescreen to distract attention from a political furore. To others, he was merely the latest middle-aged tech billionaire to chase a childhood fantasy, much as Amazon's Jeff Bezos and Tesla's Elon Musk were doing with space rockets.

The latest feature of the metaverse is here: brace yourself for digital clothing. Cyber outfits are completely sustainable – not least because they don't have any physical presence in the real world. Digital clothing is at the forefront of innovation, and at the crossroads of the digital and the real world. Are you ready to live in a 3D-navigable, socially connected, conscience-curving, carefree virtual world? Facebook's pursuit of this metaverse dream as its next platform is bold, though it may be like swapping out a car's engine while it's going 100 mph -- hard to do without crashing. Look at Apple as it transitioned from computers to iPods and iPhones. Facebook even changed its name to Meta. "The dream was to feel present with the people we care about," CEO Mark Zuckerberg explained. He also promised "immersive all-day experiences." Facebook may need a new platform anyway if the Biden administration dismantles its current one in the name of antitrust.

This has been tried before. A virtual space called "Second Life" launched in 2003. You could buy digital property and clothes with real money and hang out with other blocky avatars. It was early days. Naysayers in Silicon Valley liked to say that "Second Life" was for those who didn't have a first one.

Editor's note: Social and cultural changes in 2021 continued to influence people's lives while improved social governance and rising public interest and participation in cultural events contributed significantly to social stability. Yet some changes have created new challenges for the country. Three experts share their views on what these changes and challenges mean to the country with China Daily:

The term "metaverse" has been a hot topic of discussion since the summer, and is also among the hottest new words of the year. Although Facebook renaming itself Meta adds a whole new dimension to metaverse, Facebook and Microsoft both have staked claim to the term.

From electric cars and the metaverse to space travel and Web 3, the race is on to be this year's breakout star in a fast-moving arena

Making predictions is a mug's game, especially in technology. Who would have thought, for example, that one of the most lucrative jobs in 2021 would have been buying and selling Jpegs? I'm referring here, of course, to the craze around non-fungible tokens, or NFTs, in which rudimentary pixellated "art" pieces traded for tens of millions of dollars. That said, 2022 is almost upon us. Tectonic plates are shifting and the results will be profound. So forthwith, a smattering of prognostications about the year to come.

The jaw-dropping visual effects in "The Matrix" transformed the quest to prove what is possible on screen. The franchise returns this week to find out if there is anything more that can be done.

For the 1999 original, filmmakers invented a way to make Keanu Reeves's hero, Neo, defy physics while dodging bullets on screen. The effect blew enough minds to get a nickname—"bullet time"—plus changed the look of action movies, and influenced mediums from animation to videogames.

Web3, the next-generation internet that includes the metaverse, is far more hype than reality. But a battle is brewing over whether an internet based on blockchain technology will be decentralized—as crypto advocates would like—or controlled by Big Tech.

Jack Dorsey, co-founder of Twitter and Square, has weighed in with tweets, taking a shot at companies aiming to control—or try to dominate—Web3.

Over the next several years, the metaverse is going to become more and more commonplace in daily life. Companies, entrepreneurs and everyone in between is going to look at how to take advantage of the next big wave in tech where, instead of spending time in a browser or on a domain, users will be fully immersed in a virtual world.
As the spaces develop, cryptocurrency will help fuel the new-age exploration. Whether it's through buying up digital land or purchasing something as simple as an avatar skin, crypto will undoubtedly be a prime form of exchanging goods and services in the metaverse.

It's the first day of "OfflineTV VR," a temporary virtual space meant to replicate the feel of a real-life pop-up event the eponymous streamer collective held in LA the weekend prior.
