Metaverse, the fast-emerging digital platform of interconnecting virtual communities, will provide new business opportunities for budding Korean companies seeking investors for corporate growth and the complete commercialization of their products and services.

In an interview jointly hosted by The Korea Herald and Hyundai Futurenet, CEOs of three companies -- Warpsolution, Digisonic and Citylabs -- said they are working on ways to develop both physical and virtual technologies to enhance the metaverse environment to be similar to the real world, so that businesses can forge partnerships without having to physically meet face to face.

The promise of augmented reality so far has largely been just that - promises of a future seen through filters for our mobile phone apps or simple games that place characters with little movement on our camera screens. But if this whole metaverse thing -- the concept of a persistent, evolving online world that we don't log into as much as live inside -- is ever going to take off, we're going to need more. Our theme parks, which increasingly are centered on the concepts of games and play, may offer a glimpse of where the future is heading. In the not too distant future Universal Studios Hollywood will import a "Mario Kart"-themed ride from Japan that is centered on augmented reality, an attraction designed to create the illusion that we're interacting with virtual objects and characters.

Facebook's recent rebrand to Meta felt like a statement of intent. Beyond the more cynical reasons behind the renaming, it is clear the company is trying to replicate its social media dominance in the metaverse. However, viewing the metaverse as a winner-takes-all market might not be accurate.

"As we discuss the metaverse, we are thinking about both a new medium and an app type, like the way we talked about the web and websites a long, long time ago, aka the 1990s," Microsoft's Corporate Vice Presiden of Communications Frank Shaw said earlier this month in reference to Microsoft's Ignite conference, centred around VR, AI and hyperconnectivity in a virtual world.

A concept from Neal Stephenson's sci-fi novel has been adopted by Mark Zuckerberg. The author tells Jake Kerridge why we should think harder about what it would really mean

It seems inappropriate, somehow, that my interview with the science-fiction writer Neal Stephenson is taking place over Zoom. It's been nearly 30 years since his novel Snow Crash introduced the concept of the metaverse: a three-dimensional successor to the internet in which people adopt "avatars" (a word that Stephenson's novel brought back to mainstream attention) to interact in a virtual reality world. Surely, by now, the fact that I'm in London and he's in Seattle shouldn't prevent us sitting down to chew the fat in a bar?

Virtual worlds are already here

"A REVOLUTIONARY APPROACH on how to connect our world without being super-weird...In the Icelandverse, there's...skies you can see with your eyeballs, volcanic rocks you can caress, and really big geysers you can observe from a safe distance." So runs a viral advert designed to lure tourists to Iceland. The target of the parody is Mark Zuckerberg in particular, and Silicon Valley in general, for whom the idea of the "metaverse"--a sort of 3D sequel to today's two-dimensional internet, in which users work, play, buy and sell inside immersive virtual worlds--has become the latest Next Big Thing.

HONG KONG, Nov. 19, 2021 /PRNewswire/ — From low earth orbit (LEO) satellites, electric cars to Metaverse, these investment ideas have lured billions of dollars from investors around the world. The rising of the new ideas and Metaverse craze also hit China, and the popularity was exhibited in Beijing Stock Exchange kicks off trading, where several technology hardware companies only have the skin of the Metaverse surged and reached the limit up within hours.

To capture the hot money in the market, founders and executives have all tried to stake their claim in low earth orbit satellite development by launching partnership projects. Meanwhile, many firms are eager to brand themselves as Metaverse-related companies to attract investors, regardless they have little to do with this concept. The rising Metaverse hype and the blind speculation could create a material risk to investors who jump in with very little knowledge of the markets.

A famous Chinese sightseeing spot Zhangjiajie, where Hollywood blockbuster Avatar was shot, which unveiled what it claimed to be "the world's first scenic spot metaverse research and development (R&D) center" with aspirations to build the world of Avatar, has generated huge discussions in recent days on social media platforms about whether such an establishment is merely capitalizing on the hype and whether tourism authorities have the ability to actually make breakthroughs in one of the most cutting-edge areas of the tech sector.

Ever since Facebook rebranded itself as Meta last month, a concept that was first mooted in a 1992 science fiction novel by Neal Stephenson has become perhaps the most discussed and debated term in cyberspace (and elsewhere). The concept, that of the 'metaverse', has been specifically stated to be the inspiration for the rebranding. As the "Founder's Letter, 2021" by the Facebook CEO, Mark Zuckerberg states, "The next platform will be even more immersive — an embodied internet where you're in the experience, not just looking at it. We call this the metaverse, and it will touch every product we build. The defining quality of the metaverse will be a feeling of presence — like you are right there with another person or in another place. Feeling truly present with another person is the ultimate dream of social technology. That is why we are focused on building this."

1728 ET - Nvidia says its play on the metaverse that it calls Omniverse is winning early adopters. Its Omniverse Enterprise software, a set of tools that can be used to create online worlds, has seen "incredible" initial market reception, CFO Colette Kress says. ORIGIN CITY, Nov 17 (Reuters) - On Jan. 23, several hundred partygoers packed into an unusual art gallery. Champagne flowed into glasses that floated above a black disco floor. Guests' avatars danced to electronic music, unhindered by gravity. The host, an Indian cryptocurrency investor who goes by the name of MetaKovan, wore a purple crown.

MetaKovan – real name Vignesh Sundaresan – was holding the event in the virtual metropolis of Origin City to celebrate his recent $2.2 million purchase of a series of images by the digital artist Beeple. Sundaresan had hired architects to build the gallery in an online "metaverse" to display the works. Now, he was launching a crypto token giving buyers a stake in the art pieces.

Roblox Corp. plans to help bring educational videogames to classrooms world-wide, part of its strategy to expand its mostly teen and preteen user base and play a role in the next evolution of the internet known as the metaverse.

San Mateo, Calif.-based Roblox announced Monday that it has invested $10 million to help develop three games for middle-school, high-school and college students. The company's free platform, which is on mobile devices, computers and Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox system, had more than 47 million daily users in the third quarter, about half of whom are under the age of 13.

Something was missing from the alternative universe recently trumpeted by Mark Zuckerberg: brands. Facebook's simulations of the metaverse seemed largely free of advertising.

That absence seemed at odds with the rest of a presentation that was in part a big advert for the rebranding of Facebook as Meta, an empire that is and will be fed by advertising. Indeed, when not cartooning the future, Zuckerberg spent a lot of time name-checking companies already working with Facebook's virtual and augmented reality products and enthusing about the opportunity the metaverse offers for new business models.

The announcement that Facebook is going to change its name to Meta Platforms generated a collective groan among my peers, especially those sci-fi nerds for whom the concept of the metaverse online has been common currency for at least a decade (check out Neal Stephenson's books). For me though, the announcement had an added personal twist.

One of my oldest friends – a proper tech nerd – has been touting the enabling technologies behind the metaverse for decades. He was into virtual reality (VR) in the 1980s and 1990s and I can vividly remember him saying those infamous famous words: 'This'll be the next big thing'.

The documents about the internal functioning of Facebook, now Meta, from the cache accessed by whistleblower Frances Haugen, submitted to the US Congress and examined by The Indian Express, outline two sets of voices within the company. On one side, are staff memos and internal reports that flag issues such as misinformation, particularly about minorities, by politicians during the 2019 Lok Sabha election campaign, hate speech, and posts that could be seen as incitements to violence. On the other side, is Meta's leadership seemingly either brushing these concerns aside or insisting that it has done enough to deal with them. Given the clear social and political harm caused through and, perhaps, by Meta and its products, it is unfortunate that the leadership seems to win the day more often than not.

Companies want to build a virtual realm to copy the real world--and reshape it

CALL IT THE multiplication of the metaverses. Ever since Mark Zuckerberg, the boss of Facebook--sorry, Meta--laid out his vision in late October for immersive virtual worlds he thinks people will want to spend lots of time in, new ones are popping up all over. An entertainment metaverse will delight music fans, influencers will flock to a fashion metaverse to flaunt digital clothes, and there is even a shark metaverse (it has something to do with cryptocurrencies). Mostly these are the brainchildren of marketers slapping a new label on tech's latest craze.

Rebranded Facebook's proclaimed new focus on something called the metaverse is fascinating because, unlike its other products, the concept seems psychologically unappealing and even likely to fail - except as a twist to the oldest profession.
Ever from the lofty heights of Start-Up Nation, a certain caution is advisable with tech prognostications. Most of us are so awed by technology's scrambling of everything that we lean toward passivity as our lives and businesses are upended in waves.

When Mark Zuckerberg flipped through a series of virtual outfits for the newly-christened Meta's first tech demo, he settled on dark jeans and a navy sweater. The metaverse has been a hot topic of conversation recently, with Facebook and Microsoft both staking claims. But what is the metaverse? And when will it get here?

Author Neal Stephenson is credited with coining the term "metaverse" in his 1992 science fiction novel "Snow Crash," in which he envisioned lifelike avatars who met in realistic 3D buildings and other virtual reality environments.

India, Nov. 8 -- When Mark Zuckerberg renamed his 17-year-old company from Facebook to Meta, he billed it as a move to embrace a new paradigm in the internet - the metaverse. The future is virtual and it will bring people together to work, play, study, and create in a way never before, he proclaimed, peppering a near 80-minute presentation with colourful animation of how people in different cities can come together in a digital room, represented as any appearance they chose.

Zuckerberg's announcements are a timely reminder that technologies are changing, and many see a new inflection point on the horizon, powered by leaps in hardware development that have allowed new applications of computing power to be mainstreamed, such as Artificial Intelligence, digital currencies and virtual reality gaming.

Roblox is set to report third-quarter results after the market closes on Monday. The company's earnings report comes just as Wall Street has begun buying into the tech industry's metaverse aspirations.

Meta Platforms (ticker: FB), the company formerly known as Facebook that plans to change its ticker to "MVR" on Dec. 1, brought the metaverse into the mainstream after CEO Mark Zuckerberg pitched his plans to invest billions building it in the coming years. But Roblox, which was founded in 2004, has been discussing the concept for some time. In the company's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission ahead of its March 10 initial public offering, the word metaverse appears more than a dozen times.

Facebook gave crypto a jolt of confidence after it renamed itself Meta Platforms, signaling its embrace of the metaverse—immersive virtual worlds where people can work, play games, conduct e-commerce, and socially interact.

Crypto companies, online gaming, and digital assets broadly should benefit. A winner could be online gaming platforms and marketplaces that use nonfungible tokens, or NFTs, as in-game tokens and collectibles. Many of those companies viewed the Facebook pivot as "validation of their efforts," wrote BTIG analyst Mark Palmer. Momentum could build for virtual economies built around play-to-earn gaming models and NFTs.

Facebook and Microsofts stuffy corporate idea of the Metaverse - think virtual offices packed with creepy Dorian Gray-like avatars - is nowhere near as dystopian as the cryptocurrency-fueled metaverse that already exists today.

This latter realm is the real head-spinner, as my Bloomberg News colleagues recently depicted. It's a place that runs on decentralized finance (DeFi), a hi-octane $100 billion web of largely unregulated platforms that lend and exchange crypto for fees.

Long ago in Ireland, usually on the day of an All-Ireland Final, RTÉ television would run ads that it must have felt were suitable for simple country folk. They might be advertising a shoe shop in Tipperary or agricultural products to treat liver fluke or maybe even rhynchosporium.

Even by the clunky standards of old-style advertising, these were almost unbearably naff they seemed to regard their target market as being strangers to the modern world and its slick ways, unable to relate to the more fluid style of the latest commercials, which, in their own relatively stilted way, would today be regarded as a subject for parody.

What is lost in the frenzy over the next big thing is the question of whether it is good for society

Every once in a while, the tech community gets a metaphorical bee in its bonnet, and then tries to convince everyone that this new thing - this latest bee - is the most important bee ever and is about to change everything.

As you've undoubtedly heard, Facebook has renamed itself Meta. Some people thought that was in response to the company's recent troubles, but a company the size of Facebook doesn't go through a major rebranding in a matter of weeks. It's clearly been on the drawing board for months, if not longer. And, of course, a name change will do nothing to silence the company's critics. The name Meta is to symbolize Facebook's new product strategy - bringing social interaction, work, education and play into "the metaverse."

Metaverse, a term coined by Neal Stephenson's 1992 novel "Snow Crash," envisions a world where humans and their avatars interact with each other and software in a virtual 3D space. It's no longer science fiction. Virtual reality headsets from Meta-owned Oculus (now Reality Labs) and other companies have been on the market for years. It includes augmented reality where computer generated images are interspaced with the real world.

In 2007, a group of Stanford researchers decided to explore a novel question: What effect would a person's choice of online avatars have on their behavior?

Their findings were startling. Not only would the user operate the avatar in a way consistent with its appearance in the digital world, but the avatar's characteristics would shape the user's behavior back in the real one. A person who chooses to be taller digitally becomes a more aggressive negotiator in daily life. Someone who dons an inventor's lab coat online is more creative at real-world meetings. Adopting a character digitally, the researchers found, can essentially change a personality, in a turn that has come to be known as the Proteus Effect.
