Blockchain-based gaming platform executive declares that a decentralised internet is his priority and must be defended against Big Tech

Big Tech firms could threaten an open metaverse, as their business models go against a decentralised internet where users own their digital assets, the co-founder of blockchain-based gaming platform The Sandbox said.

Two months ago, I wrote in this column about the rebadging of the social media platform formerly known as Facebook. The beleaguered firm had decided that a name change might help shed its image as a toxic platform known for amplifying hate speech, fake news and for using surreptitiously gathered data to boost engagement and advertising revenues.

The key to Facebook's makeover was its pivot to the metaverse, a combination of virtual reality (VR), augmented reality (AR) and video, where users "live" within a digital universe. The term "metaverse" — a portmanteau of the prefix "meta" (meaning "beyond") and the suffix "verse" (shorthand for "universe") — was coined by Neal Stephenson in his 1992 science fiction novel Snow Crash, where humans, as avatars, interact with each other as well as with software agents, in a three dimensional, or 3D, space that uses a metaphor of the real world.

Mark Zuckerberg would like you to be a little more present.

That's the message that the Facebook founder hammers home in one of the most elaborate concept videos ever produced by a tech company: an 80-minute video rolling out his company's vision of "the metaverse," which Mr. Zuckerberg believes is the next paradigm shift in computing. The video -- and Facebook's decision to re-christen itself with the new corporate name Meta Platforms Inc. -- marked a fitting endpoint for a year in which the somewhat murky concept of the metaverse became one of the most hyped buzzwords in technology.

Accustomed to issuing only good news from the metaverse, crypto gaming group Animoca Brands has given its investors some more traditional updates in the past week: unaudited financials for the nine months to September and a notice of annual meeting that discloses plans to replace its auditor.

The release of the unaudited financials has been keenly awaited by the former ASX-listed group's 2500 investors and is seen as an early step in cleaning up the company ahead of any potential sharemarket listing. The company last updated investors with unaudited accounts for the 10 months ended October 2020.

Metaverse and Web 3.0 have been in the news lately for many reasons, right and wrong. Some have called it a coverup for the mistakes made in Web 2.0 and others have called it another cog in the dystopian future we are heading towards. The adman in me has a wild imagination and the dataman in me pulls the imagination into a semi reality state. Whilst I read through Mathew Ball's 33,000 word eight part primer on the #metaverse and listen to Mark Zuckerburgs initial chat with the man and then subsequently Mark and Garry V's chats, it feels that we are on the cusp of something being created.

A few weeks ago, Mark Zuckerberg, Facebook's CEO, announced that he was changing his company's name to Meta. The move was to boldly point to the future as he envisions it, a "metaverse," instead of just social media "platforms," as Facebook and Instagram are.

Many of us dismissed the talk about a metaverse, partly because we interpreted it as Facebook trying to shift the discussion away from its biggest bad-reputation period, following revelations by former employee Frances Haugen about the company's "profit-driven amorality." But also partly because most of us, I think, including me, were not aware that the metaverse is being constructed by a number of companies and some basic parts of it are already here.

I confess that I've been skeptical about Facebook, sorry, Meta Platforms' vision of the metaverse, with virtual meetings, virtual concerts, and Ready Player One-style virtual worlds.

But I had a revelation recently while pedaling away at home on my road bike. Yes, at home. My rear wheel was removed and my bike was affixed to a smart trainer made by a company called Wahoo. I was staring at the MacBook screen in front of my bike, riding through a land called Watopia in a cycling application called Zwift. That's when it hit me that I had been experiencing the metaverse for months without quite realizing it.

Zuckerberg says the metaverse won't be created by one company but would rather be built by many creators and developers

After artificial intelligence, machine learning and blockchain, there is a new buzzword in the world of the internet: metaverse. Although the phrase isn't of recent vintage, its usage gained popular currency only after tech behemoth Facebook announced the change of the company's name to Meta Platforms Inc on October 29. But what exactly is metaverse? When will it happen? And does it have the potential to revolutionise the internet the way Facebook or Google did? Read on to find out:

Metaverse has the potential to transform livelihoods and businesses. But proper regulation is vital

Picture this: you put on a pair of glasses, and you're transported to a sprawling golf course. You play a few rounds before your first meeting at 10 a.m., when you switch to your work avatar and enter your virtual office. At lunch, you decide to try on some new clothes for the dinner you're attending next Friday, and settle on a dress you've been eyeing for a while. You're excited to wrap up work early so you can attend that concert that's happening 6,000 km away. All of this, and you haven't ventured outside of your home once.

The metaverse is coming. It was once a science-fiction fantasy, most notably in Neal Stephenson's novel "Snow Crash," of an all-encompassing virtual universe that would exist alongside the physical one. But technological advances have brought this transformation of human society close enough to reality to demand that we consider its consequences.

In the metaverse, a user might curate a digital avatar, like a character in a video game. Through the eyes of their avatar, they would experience a digital reality as active and engaging as the physical one. Some futurists believe that soon we might attend doctor's appointments or class there.

Videogames have enjoyed a pandemic-era renaissance, but shares of the industry's original player have been left behind. Nintendo's American depositary shares are down 29% in 2021.

The Japanese videogame giant (ticker: NTDOY) is still making games that are adored by its fans. But investors have spent much of the year looking for companies making big promises about the "metaverse"—the idea of virtual worlds that enable social interaction and commerce. That has powered stocks like Roblox (RBLX) and Nvidia (NVDA) to huge gains this year. Roblox, which makes tools for gamers to create online worlds, mentioned "metaverse" 17 times in a recent investor-day meeting.

Non-fungible tokens (NFTs) are all the rage. From musicians to film stars, everyone is trying to monetise NFTs comprising paintings, pictures, autographs and dialogues. No wonder, NFT has been declared as the word of the year.

According to Collins Dictionary, the word saw a 'meteoric' rise in usage, up 11,000% in the last year. The dictionary defines NFT as "a unique digital certificate, registered in a blockchain that is used to record ownership of an asset such as an artwork or a collectible". The lexicographers, who monitor the 4.5 billion-word Collins Corpus, find this word a "unique technicolour collision of art, technology and commerce" that has "broken through the Covid noise" to become ubiquitous.

A question that has perplexed scientists for nearly half a century may have finally been answered. No, we haven't discovered aliens, but may have found another world within ours. The only catch: It is virtual and goes by the name of "metaverse". A term first coined in 1992 in a sci-fiction novel by Neal Stephenson, the metaverse is a combination of two words — meta meaning beyond and stem meaning universe. The term is basically an idea of a virtual reality where users can buy land, building, create their own avatars and build their virtual universe. Within the metaverse, people can roam around, meet their friends, visit buildings, attend events and even buy goods and services using cryptocurrency. People within the metaverse would be connected all the time without having to worry about physical distances or borders. The concept gained more popularity during the Covid-19 pandemic, as lockdowns pushed more and more people to share online spaces for longer hours.

While nothing is more powerful than real physical human connection, the digital virtual tech-driven world was the big story for media and entertainment in 2021.
In particular, 2021 marked the coming out party for the blockchain – a kind of transformational decentralized Web 3.0 world. In the world of media, the headline blockchain story took its form in so-called non-fungible tokens (NFTs). Will the blockchain's adoption in media accelerate in 2022?

Because index-fund fees are so low-zero in some cases-you might think it's impossible to own the same stocks directly yet earn a better return.

But an increasing number of investors are doing just that, in their taxable accounts, by using a strategy known as direct indexing. The tactic involves buying the underlying securities of an index, such as the S&P 500, then selling the stocks that decline. In a good year, the investor captures the gains of the chosen index while creating losses that at tax time help offset capital gains, thus helping them keep more of their profits.

Virtual realms known as the metaverse that have become the hot topic for tech companies also are winning a new fan base among investors.

SoftBank Group Corp. on Tuesday said it was investing $150 million in a South Korean metaverse platform. A cadre of metaverse-themed, exchange-traded funds have launched in recent months -- some showing gains. Shares have also surged in companies making early bets on what some tech executives have described as the next phase of the internet, while others say it is a hyped vision that will take years to realize.

In some parts of the internet, there is an often-told tragedy about a World of Warcraft player. He had worked hard to gain new abilities for his character, but one day the company behind the game arbitrarily and unexpectedly interfered. "Blizzard removed the damage component from my beloved warlock's Siphon Life spell," he wrote. "I cried myself to sleep."

That player was Vitalik Buterin, the creator of Ethereum, a blockchain network for applications and services on which no central administrator - such as video-game maker Blizzard - would ever hold unchecked power over users. (Or, at least, that is the grand vision.)

Donning cumbersome headsets, I can jack into the new "digital oasis" where thousands of others will likely migrate. At my fingertips, I can do practically anything from work and play to hanging out and shopping when in fact I am alone in a room. This is the metaverse, or the virtual world that will be the next chapter of the internet.

In late October, Facebook boss Mark Zuckerberg changed the parent company's name to Meta in line with his plans to create the so-called metaverse. He also unveiled a new blue infinity sign at the company's headquarters. The rebranding does not apply to current platforms like Facebook, Instagram and Whatsapp, but points to where the company is going.

THE strangest thing I experienced in 2021 was the "metaverse" taking off as a buzzword, as if it were anything new. It isn't.

In 2003, Linden Lab launched Second Life (SL): a 3D virtual world. I signed up a few years after that. There, I had 2 best friends. One was a young woman from the Netherlands, who went by "Mystique". The other was a man from Germany - I forget what he called himself - who liked to stand around in a pirate suit, building things.

The latest hot real-estate market isn't on the scenic coasts or in balmy Sunbelt cities. It's in the metaverse, where gamers are flocking and digital property sales are setting new records.

A growing number of investment firms are acquiring digital land in worlds such as the Sandbox and Decentraland, where players simulate real-life pursuits, from shopping to attending a concert. They are betting that individuals and companies will spend money to use virtual homes and retail space and that the value of properties will increase as more people join the worlds.

Transactions for properties in digital realms are jumping, guided by the same principle in the physical world: location, location, location.

Justin Bieber performed at a live concert this month, but the show wasn't in a stadium or an arena. Like recent performances from Ariana Grande, the Weeknd and Travis Scott, this concert was held in the metaverse, the online world that stretches the corners of the internet into immersive, four-dimensional experiences.

It's happening, and holds out both promise and peril

In the beginning, the Internet was mainly read-only, a giant information-sharing network, PC-based and largely decentralised. With Web 2.0 after the turn of the century came social networks and the birth of online communities and interactive content delivered also on mobile devices. But it was platform-based and more centralised, with big tech companies like Facebook being the gatekeepers. What's emerging now is totally different.

Brands had been toying with the metaverse for some time before Facebook's recent name change turned the term into a household word. Now some of them are getting serious.

Companies including Chipotle Mexican Grill Inc., Verizon Communications Inc. and streetwear brand Vans earlier this year built their own digital worlds on metaverse-like platforms such as Roblox Corp. and Fortnite Creative in an attempt to improve brand recognition and get existing customers more engaged.

India, Nov. 29 -- It is not real yet but things are moving along at a feverish pace. Metaverse, a dream sold to us most vocally by Mark Zuckerberg of Meta (formerly Facebook) and followed up by the world of tech and beyond, is at best described as a hypothetical evolution of the internet in its current form, and it may or may not happen, however, the number of believers is significantly higher.

If you thought only tech companies have ambitions for the metaverse future, that wouldn't be true. Real estate, fashion, entertainment, and gaming companies are making a beeline for the next big upgrade to the internet, sending the digital real estate prices soaring

The new name was designed to reflect a focus beyond the Facebook social network platform, and into the metaverse - the extension of the internet into three-dimensional virtual reality (VR) spaces. However, given Facebook's handling - or mishandling - of their current social responsibilities, we should be cautious about how much control a single company should have over the potential metaverse. LP	IN the midst of the scandals of the Facebook papers, Facebook rebranded the company as Meta. The new name was designed to reflect a focus beyond the Facebook social network platform, and into the metaverse - the extension of the internet into three-dimensional virtual reality (VR) spaces. However, given Facebook's handling - or mishandling - of their current social responsibilities, we should be cautious about how much control a single company should have over the potential metaverse. We have an opportunity to be proactive regarding the construction of social worlds within virtual reality rather than the reactive state we find ourselves in regarding Meta's current social products.

When Mark Zuckerberg announced the rebranding of Facebook to Meta late last month in a "founder's letter," I was on a video call with my writing group, discussing the tactile joys of our craft -- the benefits of writing by hand, our love of beautiful Rhodia writing pads, our favorite examples of manuscript pages (mine: David Foster Wallace's, reeking of chew). Among the three of us, we owned five typewriters and no social media accounts. There we were in the metaverse, longing for the one thing it can't provide: the experience of touch.

Through virtual and augmented reality (also Ray-Ban Stories smart glasses), Meta's technology aims to change how we live, how we connect with friends and family. (Imagine teleporting hologram-you to concerts or Thanksgiving dinners.) Except for all its patter about bringing people together, Meta advances a fundamental human disconnection: It removes our bodies from the equation.

Brilliant or bananas? If the idea of parallel digital universes takes off, e-commerce and entertainment could be vastly transformed.

FOR fans of the rapper Snoop Dogg, a Hong Kong company wants to offer an opportunity to visit his mansion – not here in our physical reality, but in a 3D video game. In this virtual world, dubbed "The Sandbox", players can head to a digital recreation of the Dogg mansion, enjoy virtual concerts and collect "Dogg style" digital assets. Snoop Dogg described the game – which is set to launch an initial version on Nov 29 – as "the future of virtual hangouts".
